Condé Nast's Portfolio magazine published an article titled "The Optimist" by Jesse Eisinger in its May 2009 issue. The article includes the following comments that were made by, or based on statements made by, William A. Ackman, the founder and managing member of the general partner of Pershing Square Capital Management, L.P.

Excerpts from the article below in quotation marks connote quotes from Mr. Ackman, all others are excerpts from the article as written by the author.

On the ideas that Pershing Square previously presented to Target:

Ackman urged Target's management to sell its credit-card business to get rid of consumer-credit exposure and use the proceeds to buy back stock. He also wanted the company to realize the underlying value of its vast real estate holdings.

On the proxy contest to elect the Nominees for Shareholder Choice:

At Target's annual meeting in May, Ackman is running for a position on the company's board. He has recruited four other candidates who have specialized in real estate, credit cards, and retailing to serve on his slate. It's going to be very high-minded, he says of his campaign. But he is also evincing the old stubbornness. The only Stalinesque election process in America is the election for directors of American corporations, he tells me. And I just think that's wrong.
